

HIST 2283

Environment History

This course investigates the relationships between humans and their environment, and how and why these relationships have changed over time. Topics of study include: theoretical and methodological approaches to environmental history; differing conceptions of the environment; the impact of industrialization; the spread of settlement, and resource exploitation; the changing nature of environmentalism; and new directions.
